Generally, I like checkered housings, but I prefer smooth side borders, as on Flat vs. Arched mainspring housing I like the arched better myself. I'm an advocate of point shooting in some situations and the arched mainspring housing points better. I'd really like to try Ed Brown's wedge Purpose of an arched mainspring housing Is the purpose of an arched mainspring housing solely to change the feel of the grip, and to help insure the grip safety is more easily disengaged or both? Or neither? Arched vs. Flat Mainspring Housing I'm big-handed, and liked the feel of the arched mainspring housing, but after doing some experimenting and swapping back and forth at the range, found the flat Arched , Or Flat Mainspring Housing Arched mainspring housing cures shooting low, short trigger is easier to reach and control. Flat mainspring housings and long triggers (usually with "lightening" holes) are Arched vs Flat Mainspring Housings? Put an arched mainspring housing on it and I begin saying inappropriate things, create a safe queen or a For Sale ad. Or I make it rightfor me. The modern production - Curved Backstrap vs Straight The arched MSH seems to angle my palm a little more into the grip. I have heard other folks report the exact opposite experience, so it must be a matter of the specific individual. Arched mainspring housing on I have a friend who claims he can double tap a much faster with an arched mainspring housing than with the flat one.
